Accumulation phase

Market performance

Following two consecutive weeks of growth, the market recorded a correction last week as investor sentiment turned more cautious.

Chart: Accumulation phase

The long-term uptrend has been reconfirmed, as the VN-Index returned to close above its long-term moving averages, including the 50- and 100-period lines.

Over the short term, the index resumed its uptrend with a breakout session at the start of the week, finding support around the 50-period moving average amid improving liquidity. However, an accumulation phase has emerged, with the index fluctuating within a narrow range and forming small-bodied candles. Therefore, a breakout session is needed to confirm the uptrend ahead.

This week, the 1,800–1,850 point range will serve as strong short-term support, coinciding with the short-term moving averages. In addition, the 1,900–1,950 point range will act as strong resistance, aligning with the index's historical peak zone.

→ An accumulation phase has emerged but does not affect the short-term uptrend. Therefore, investors should maintain their current equity allocation within their portfolios.

Technical strategy: Maintain current equity allocation

In this situation, investors may maintain and open additional new positions, focusing on leading stocks this week.
